A DEEPER DIVE

My Culinary Detour

One day I decided to quit my day job, enroll at The French Culinary Institute in NYC, and become America's next top chef. Well, that was the plan anyway. A year later, I graduated with a Certificat d'Aptitude Professionnelle (CAP) and landed my first kitchen job. Six weeks in a posh Upper East Side restaurant as an apprentice nearly did me in. So, what did I do? I jumped from the frying pan into the fire and took off for Europe where I did a stint at a restaurant in Paris. Luckily, my visa expired before the chef's patience, so I headed to Norway where I landed another restaurant job. And it was there, along the icy shores of some Norwegian fjord, that I realized the recipe for fulfillment probably lay elsewhere.

Before the Pots, Pans and Call Sheets

Before stumbling onto a career in television, I worked for Scandinavian Airlines System. Starting out in the reservations department, I moved on to sales and marketing and eventually joined the company's initiative to expand service to the Baltic countries, Eastern Europe, and the former Soviet Union. I traveled extensively to those places as the company developed its regional marketing strategy and witnessed the "world wake up from history."

What an adventure. Here's to making new ones!
